Paper Prototype Tests

Test 1 - Stephen

- The calendar button in the messaging page was not clear. He did not know how to schedule a meeting after discussing a meeting time with contact.
- Back button v. hamburger - It was unclear how to get back to the page you were just on versus getting to the side menu
- Home page label - Unclear what the feed is on the home page
  - How can I distinguish between people I've already spoken with versus new people that the app finds interesting for me?

Test 2 - Jing

- Confused at first about the difference between skills and interests but the help buttons helped clarify the situation.
- Confusion between schedule and messaging - does not want to have to talk to someone in order to schedule a meeting. Would rather just be able to see someone's available time and schedule that way. Suggested that it would be annoying with a large user base.
- Had no difficulty getting back to home in order to get to the side bar menu

Changes

- We decided to leave back buttons and hamburger menu as is and make the side bar menu only accessible via the Home Feed Page.
- We updated the Home Feed page to include information as to what the feed is showing (ie people that fit your interests). Once you contact someone, a new section will appear on the Home Feed page that says "People You've Contacted"
- Removed the calendar icon from the message activity page
- Added "Share Calendar"/"Request Access" feature - only share with those that you are comfortable meeting with (either after a conversation or after you've looked over their profile, etc)
  - When a user finds someone they are interested in chatting with, they can select to either send a message or see a calendar. Via this sharing calendar, the users can see when each other is available and suggest those times in the messaging feature.
- Based on reactions from users, we are also considering dropping the scheduling feature in favor of focusing on connections.
